On 10 June 1763 Sadler wrote to Wedgwood: "I this day rec[eive]d from London some Plates of Landskips." The engraving of this scene has been attributed to Samuel Wale, whom Sadler described to Wedgwood in an earlier letter as "the principal Person that designs for us." A study of Wale's output, however, shows that he was primarily an illustrator who made drawings for others to engrave. Sadler was being strictly accurate in saying that he designed rather than engraved for him. Wale's surviving work consists of figure-groups and buildings rather than pure landscapes. Both the designer and the engraver of this scene therefore remain unknown.

The mug dates from after Sadler had retired from his partnership with Green in 1770, but still includes Sadler's signature in the print. The "landskip" is probably one of the engraved plates Sadler and Green bought in 1763, and is also known on a Worcester porcelain mug of the 1760s with Sadler's signature. Wedgwood did not approve of Sadler signing prints on creamware printed for Wedgwood's own orders, but could do nothing about creamware which Sadler printed and sold on his own account, either to Liverpool dealers or directly for export.
